ANGELA BASSETT IN THE MARCH ISSUE OF MORE

Plus Jane Smiley on Love, Freedom and Midlife Sex; The Ultimate Girlfriends' Getaway; Spring Fashion to Fit Your Life Now

ANGELA ASCENDING; pg. 117

She's fought for everything she has: her acting career, her marriage, and her twins. As her searing memoir arrives in bookstores, Angela Bassett talks candidly to More's Meryl Gordon about her bumpy road to joy. "In my twenties, I was so focused on me and my career. Now that I've had success in that arena and feel confident in my work, I can give more time and appreciation to family." When reminded she'll be in her sixties when the twins get to college she replies, "But I'll be a good-looking 60! Some people fight their age, but I feel good about being 48."

ROSSEAU'S BRAINSTORM; pg. 84

Dr. Gail Rosseau, 50, is one of the country's top neurosurgeons and she wants to give women who have had breast cancer a chance to know their future. She has recently announced a pioneering trial screening program aimed at spotting breast cancer that has spread to the brain, before patients show any symptoms. However, some say such scans don't make a difference in how long people live. Laurence Gonzales explores if doctors can make this early knowledge useful or if, for the patient, ignorance is bliss.

THE MENTOR'S MANUAL; pg. 72

Networking in our twenties and thirties was a contact sport; the more, the better. But now, as seasoned careerists, women crave connections that can help them with complicated work issues. How can women fish for what they need while avoiding the sharks? How can women give back without giving it all away? Mary Lou Quinlan discusses how, after 40, networking and mentoring are all about focus planning and selectivity – and sometimes saying no.

THE OVER 40 BODY TUNE-UP; pg. 139

It really is harder to lose weight at midlife. But we can help you get your body's fat-burning engine up and running again. More offers tips, tricks, expert advice and inspiration for winning the losing game. Find out how what you drink could be holding you back and how fat-cell research is shedding light on the cause – and possible cure – for midlife weight gain.

GIRLS IN THE MIST; pg. 123

Two friends fulfill a dream of traveling to Uganda to track mountain gorillas. Editor in Chief, Peggy Northrop, tells More about this amazing adventure at the Gorilla Forest Camp with her friend, anthropologist Joyce Powzyk; a trip packed with moments that are both dangerous and breathtaking, rekindling memories of their first safari together 20 years ago.
